Dear Diary... and Brutus. Let me start off by saying that I was not a Rush fan when I purchased this book. I simply went through a remarkably similar tragedy as Mr. Peart did, and a friend of mine who was a fan of Rush noticed the book (although he didn't read it) and mentioned it to me shortly I experienced my losses. My friend explained that Peart was the drummer and lyricist for Rush, and that Peart's talent's in those fields were unmatched, "deep" in his opinion, and that maybe Peart's experiences would help me deal with mine. I picked up the book with very few expectations, as I never knew the man, and began to read it. My first impression was "It sure must be nice to be wealthy enough to take a few years off to mourn such a loss". Most people can't just pick up and abandon much of their "old world" like Peart did. I felt that his hard work over the years afforded him such a "luxury", if picking up the pieces of a tragic puzzle and reassembling something completely new out of them can be called that. I felt confident, since he had so much free time to reflect while experiencing the world in which he chose to travel, that I would gain much insight from his times of solitude and reflection. I did not have that kind of free time, as I had to work mere hours after my losses, and I was looking forward to the insights that Peart had in his years of reflection. I was unfortunately wrong in my assumptions. While I can personally understand the depths of sorrow, loneliness, confusion, and despair that fate chose to place as an anchor upon Peart's heart, I also was struck by the impression of him as a self-absorbed millionaire who showed great disdain for the very people whose hard earned money made him so successful.
